Nice Publication, but Just Not Enough Detail To Ogle and Amaze By SLS Vinny Lee's book Kitchenalia was full of detailed photos and text that delivered full satisfaction with every page. Homes from Home, however, is disappointing, especially since a quick leaf through at the bookstore was enough to put the book on my Must Buy This list. Unfortunately, closer inspection reveals Homes from Home is hardly more than just a bunch of matte photographs of small living quarters related by material or location: wood, clay, canvas, water, trees. Each chapter has ample photographs as examples. But the homes chosen for further scrutiny are each given only 2 to 4 pages. Naturally, the structures range from small to tiny, but they each deserve more detail to get a sense of their livability, creativity, and funkiness. Ironically, the most interesting supporting homes are those NOT selected for a 2 or 4 page spread. They mostly get a single sentence caption for their sole photographs. Fewer extraneous photographs, more substantive selections, and even just a few house plans could have made this a top-notch book to treasure. Instead, Homes from Home left me wanting more. And not in a good way. 0 of 0 people found the following

There is an enormous pleasure in having a place where you can get away from it all, a small intimate space where you can live out your fantasies or simply indulge a passion. This could be a boat moored on an urban waterway or a wilderness shack miles from anywhere, lost among nature. The book is divided into two main sections, with a wealth of case studies showing a fantastic selection of individual homes from home. Huts and Hideways includes low-impact buildings, often constructed to blend with their surroundings, made of materials sympathetic to their environment. They include cabins made from wood, metal and stone or carved from the landscape itself, to treehouses perched in leafy heights. The second section Homes to Go covers mobile or moveable accommodation, providing temporary shelter in various locations, from vintage shepherds huts and gleaming airstream trailers to bell tents and tipis and sleek and compact boats.
